Oxygen, forming HgO; but at a somewhat higher temperature the compound formed is decomposed. Thirdly. It is ordinarily prepared by heating Potassic Chlorate, KClO₃, 2(KClO₃) heated=2lC--Td2 But it is found that the reaction proceeds more gradually and at a lower temperature, if some Manganese di-oxide, MnO₂) be present. But the latter takes no part in the chemical action. Properties. 123. Physical. Oxygen is a gas which has never yet been liquified. It is colorless, tasteless, and odorless. Water dissolves a volume of Oxygen equal to.041 of the bulk of the water at 32F. Chemical. It is characterized by chemical properties of the greatest activity, the widest range and the greatest usefulness. 124. (i) It is a supporter of combustion, both in the ordinary air and in the unmixed gas; but under the latter circumstances Oxygen burns ordinary combustibles with greater energy, and also burns substances ordinarily considered incombustible. The products of such combustion are, in general, oxides, and in most cases the combustion is initiated by aid of high temperature. Decay and rust are forms of slow combustion, in which the process is aided by a thin film of moisture. 125. (ii) Animal respiration is likewise a form of slow combustion. Fresh air is necessary for respiration as well as for combustion. The chimney of a stove removes the deleterious products of combustion and at the same time produces a current whereby fresh oxygen is supplied. The action of the animal lungs accomplishes both these...
